To save the food bowl and stop the carbon tax— Fight the Queen!

Have no illusion—the Gillard government is pushing ahead with its plan to crush agriculture in the Murray-Darling Basin. After an initial setback following furious community reaction to the Murray-Darling Basin Authority plan, which claimed MDBA chairman Mike Taylor, the forces driving to smash the food bowl have regrouped, and Water Minister Tony Burke has appointed Craig Knowles, yet another politician-cum-banker, as the new MDBA chairman. Knowles is disarmingly making reassuring noises to irrigators that the MDBA plan is off the table, all the while both the banks whose interests he represents, and the Minister who appointed him, are pushing ahead with the shut-down of the basin.

As foreshadowed in the MDBA-commissioned Rizza Report, the banks are withdrawing credit from family farmers in the basin, and leaving a quiet trail of destroyed lives and livelihoods in their wake. Water Minister Tony Burke, himself a hard core greenie, told the ABC's Four Corners on 7th March he has every intention of ramming through the wholesale annihilation he calls "reform": "The greatest enemy of water reform is delay," he said. "I will talk about everything else that might be a way of finding a compromise that works for communities, about finding ways of being more efficient in how we care for our environmental assets, but I will not tolerate discussion about further delay."

Indeed, the Gillard government has upped the ante with its plan to impose a carbon tax, which itself will destroy food production in large parts of the basin. The scientific sell-outs at the CSIRO who've embraced climate change quackery have modelled the extent to which various levels of a carbon tax would increasingly replace food production in the lower MDB with "carbon storage" in soils and tree plantations. At $36 per tonne, food production in the entire lower Murray-Darling Basin will be replaced altogether.

Queen and Green

The MDBA plan and the carbon tax have something in common: they are despised by the public. The MDBA plan is universally loathed by its intended victims among the three million Australians who live in the Basin, and opinion polls show the sympathies of the majority of Australians who don't live in the Basin are with the farmers—Aussies know where their food comes from. The carbon tax is even more reviled, viewed by the great majority of Australians from one end of the nation to the other as an unaffordable, crushing addition to the already unbearable cost of living which has reached crisis levels. Its predecessor, the emissions trading scheme (ETS), was so toxic it toppled both Prime Minister Kevin Rudd, and Opposition leader Malcolm Turnbull, when they colluded to try to force it on Australians.

So why is Gillard pushing ahead with green policies that are so potentially politically fatal to her? The answer is... the Queen.

Queen Elizabeth II personally leads an international drive to deindustrialise the world, using the environment, and fabricated environmental "threats" such as global warming. The Queen rarely intervenes publicly in politics, preferring to exercise her monarchical power behind the scenes, so as to not draw attention to the enormous power she actually wields. For example, under Section 59 of Australia's Commonwealth Constitution, she has the power to override any law passed by the Commonwealth Parliament within twelve months of its assent by the Governor-General. This incredible power has no qualifications, and shows the claim that the Queen is a mere figurehead, and that the Governor-General is Australia's actual head of state, to be laughable. She has discretely exercised her Royal prerogative over Australia's Commonwealth and State governments far more often than the public realise, most notably by her sacking of the democratically-elected Whitlam Labor government in 1975, when that government's "buy back the farm" campaign to exert national control over Australia's resources threatened the extensive resource holdings of Rio Tinto, the mining company owned by the Queen herself. [The proof that the Queen owns Rio Tinto comes from the company itself, which promotes its Argyle Diamond Mine in The Kimberley in WA as the Queen's diamond mine—Ed.]

But the Queen does publicly intervene when it comes to promoting environmentalism and its genocidal agenda of global population reduction, as trumpeted by her own husband, Prince Philip. She allowed her husband to use his Royal title to launch environmentalism when he founded the World Wildlife Fund in 1961, and the Australian Conservation Foundation in 1963; she deployed her own Official Secretary to the Australian Governor-General, Sir Murray Tyrrell—who was stationed in Buckingham Palace for much of 1962—to get the ACF up and running the following year, for which she knighted him; she led the global escalation of the green movement around "Earth Day" in 1970, urging Australians in a national broadcast in April that year to "care for the environment", at the same time as her husband's WWF was orchestrating the world's first environmental treaty, the Ramsar Convention on Wetlands of International Importance, which is now the legal mechanism being used to shut down the Murray-Darling food bowl.

By her reserved standards, she has gone positively berserk over global warming, and repeatedly pulled rank to force the fraud down people's throats. In 2004, she ordered British Prime Minister Tony Blair to make action on climate change the focus of Britain's turn at the presidency of the European Union. That same year, she deployed Tony Blair's top science adviser Sir David King, in what Britain's 31st October, 2004 Observer newspaper called a "rare intervention in world politics", to the United States to convince then President George W. Bush that climate change was a greater threat than global terrorism.

The Queen went into overdrive in the lead-up to the December 2009 Copenhagen conference, which was supposed to achieve a binding global climate change treaty centred on a global emissions trading scheme. She used her speech at the Trinidad and Tobago Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting (CHOGM) a month earlier to order the assembled government leaders of her old Empire, the Commonwealth, to lead the world on action on climate change. "The Commonwealth can be proud of the fact that in each of its six decades, it has shaped the international response to emerging global challenges", she droned. "And on this, the eve of the UN Copenhagen Summit on Climate Change, the Commonwealth has an opportunity to lead once more. The threat to our environment is not a new concern. But it is now a global challenge which will continue to affect the security and stability of millions for years to come. ... In a world where political, economic and environmental problems and opportunities cross continents, the Commonwealth will also need to prove its relevance beyond its own borders and develop a truly global perspective." Indeed, a truly global dictatorship under cover of fighting "climate change".

Copenhagen's failure was due to a sovereign revolt from nations not willing to commit to mass genocide against their populations, not to a lack of Royal effort. The Queen's son and heir, Prince Charles, attended on Her Majesty's behalf to harangue the delegates to submit to a deal, and Australia's Prime Minister Kevin Rudd—a longstanding asset of the Crown [see The New Citizen, Oct./Nov. 2009]—trashed Australia's relationship with the Chinese, whom he insulted as "ratf*ckers", trying to implement the Queen's CHOGM orders.

Global eco-fascism

What the Queen is pushing is nothing less than a global eco-fascist dictatorship. The 2009 Copenhagen conference was intended to achieve that through a legally binding international treaty that would have stripped nations of their sovereignty. Dan Cass, who represented the Australian Conservation Foundation at the 1992 Rio Earth Summit, even called for such a treaty to be enforced militarily (The Age, Dec. 10, 2010).

Copenhagen failed, but now that same agenda has re-emerged in Europe, under the Queen's direction. The German Advisory Council on Global Change, known as the WBGU, has just released a manifesto entitled "World in Transition—A Social Contract for Sustainability", which demands a "great transformation" in production, consumption patterns, and lifestyles, to achieve a zero-carbon economy, without fossil fuels or nuclear power. The transformation will be as radical as in the previous two fundamental transformations in world history—the transformation from hunter/gatherer societies to agrarian, and the Industrial Revolution—only this time, the transformation would go backwards, to a "climate-friendly and sustainable world economic order". And, although the authors naturally don't say so, that means lowering energy consumption to return to the population potential of pre-industrial society, or about two billion people, which will be achieved if the developing and so-called emerging countries submit to this eco-dictatorship, because the death rate will know no bounds. To create the "contractual basis" for this new, sustainable world economic order, the authors bombastically demand a new "world social contract", enforced by "a UN Council for Sustainable Development, co-equal to the Security Council and reflecting the world of the states in the 21st Century", constituting a world government with absolute authority.

Although nominally German, the WBGU is in fact British, and acting on behalf of the Queen to create an alliance between Britain and Germany to force a zero-carbon régime on Europe, which will be a template for the whole world. Chairing the WBGU is Dr. Hans Schellnhuber, who previously headed the climate change work at the Tyndall Centre of Britain's now discredited East Anglia University. Schellnhuber is a favourite of the Queen. She deployed him to accompany British science adviser Sir David King on his 2004 mission to convince George Bush on global warming, and that same year she personally opened a British-German Climate Conference at the British Embassy in Berlin, during the course of which she inducted Professor Schellnhuber as an Honorary Commander of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire (CBE).

It's already here!

The transformation envisaged by the WBGU is already well underway in Australia. The "sustainable" Murray-Darling Basin Plan to destroy the national food bowl and the carbon tax/ETS are the looming threats, but they build on decades of fascist green policies that have been imposed dictatorially on Australians—from the landmark Franklin Dam case in 1983, which was forced onto the Tasmanian people against their clear will, using international treaties and mainland activists, to the locking up of land in national parks, the shutdown of obviously renewable and viable timber industries, and the bans on agricultural land-clearing.

Driving the MDBA Plan and the carbon tax is the British Crown's clear intention to reduce Australia's population, down to as few as five million people. All of the key personnel pushing the two schemes are Crown agents, and proponents of radical population reduction. The MDBA plan is the work of Prince Philip's WWF, which designed the Ramsar Treaty on which it is based, and the WWF front the Wentworth Group of Concerned Scientists, whose doyen, Professor Tim Flannery, demands Australia's population be cut back to as few as six million people—a goal which destroying food production in the Murray-Darling will make inevitable. Flannery is now also the Chairman of the Government's new Climate Change Commission, which was established to propagandise for a carbon tax/ETS.

And Julia Gillard herself, a supposed republican, is so gung-ho to sacrifice Australian lives and living standards to a Royal agenda because she is a proud member of the Fabian Society, all of the 19th Century British founders of which, including HG Wells and George Bernard Shaw, advocated the same genocidal population reduction as the Royal's green movement today. Gillard flashed her Union Jack underwear when she created a Ministry for "Sustainable Population"—a euphemism for getting rid of people—under former Wilderness Society activist and current MDB grim reaper Tony Burke.

Fight for national sovereignty, economic development

The Australian people hate green fascism, but to beat it, they have to fight the British Crown. They must join the Citizens Electoral Council's war of national liberation against the British Empire, and fight for the common good of people, for true national sovereignty, and for economic development. If they choose to settle for the assurances and promises of the Tony Abbott/Barnaby Joyce coalition, they will, yet again, be sold out—remember, in the Howard government, Abbott and Joyce both supported the Water Act 2007 which instigated the MDBA Plan, and a carbon emissions trading scheme to siphon money off the people to prop up bankrupt City of London banks.

The CEC has an economic development program for Australia, which calls for:

- junking the free trade and green policies that have annihilated Australian industry;
- establishing a national bank to invest in industry and infrastructure;
- reviving agriculture by fostering a return to independent family farms, underpinned by parity pricing for agricultural production;

- re-establishing Australia as a manufacturing powerhouse, with a strong machine tool sector;
- constructing large-scale water, transportation and power infrastructure—the CEC has plans for 18 great water projects including the Clarence River and Bradfield schemes, a high-speed mag-lev rail network, and a nuclear power grid which utilises Australia’s abundance of uranium and thorium deposits;
- 50 million people by 2050—a natural result of implementing the above program.

Australia as a nation will not survive any more of the Queen’s green fascism. Now is the time to fight!
