

Green Fascists are Destroying Tasmania

Green fascists personally led by Prince Philip have for 50 years targeted Tasmania for economic shut down and population reduction.

What they were intent on destroying—and are succeeding—is Tasmania’s potential for economic development.

Tasmania’s natural resources of water, deep sea ports, fertile land and population made it a perfect place for hydroelectricity, food production, forestry and manufacturing, with the ability to supply essential goods to a population much greater than its own.

Tasmania’s great premier, Eric Reece, aka “Electric Eric”, in 1973 expressed his government’s intention to achieve this potential: “The economic, ecological and general physical problems should be examined and equated to ensure that mankind obtains the best possible results, in future, in continuing his earthly existence,” he said.

However, after five decades of relentless green assault, Tasmania has the lowest population growth in Australia, an exodus of futureless young people from the state, and now imports its electricity from Victoria via Basslink.

Prince Philip started the green movement to shut down developments that support growing populations.

Hydroelectricity

Premier “Electric Eric” Reece (left) enraged Prince Philip by refusing to back down on building the Gordon Dam (right).

Under Eric Reece, Tasmania’s Hydro-Electric Commission planned a three-stage development of Tasmania’s Southwest to achieve electricity production on the same scale as the world-famous Snowy Mountains Scheme, at one-third of the cost.

Prince Philip’s Australian Conservation Foundation (ACF), which he started in 1963 to reduce Australia’s population and lock away land from Australians in national parks, led the campaign to kill off the hydro plan; Philip took a hands-on role, which included personally flying over Lake Pedder in a helicopter, and editing the ACF’s publication, The Pedder Papers. (Certain ACF dignitaries were initially reluctant to appear radical, but Prince Philip approved a takeover of the ACF to make it more militant.)

The entire global green movement was focussed on shutting down development in Tasmania: the 1972 International Union for Conservation of Nature’s (IUCN) Second World Conference on National Parks heard an address entitled “Case Study: Increasing pressures for Resources Development in an Area of High Nature Conservation Values, Southwest Tasmania.” (The IUCN was started by Prince Philip’s buddy Julian Huxley, the president of the British Eugenics Society, which pushed the Nazi race science practised by Hitler, after Hitler gave eugenics a bad name, Huxley said that conservation sought to achieve eugenics goal of population reduction “under other language”.)

Only the strong leadership of Reece and his willingness to personally stand up to Philip—which included a shouting-match between the two at Government House—saw the middle stage of the development, the Gordon Power Station, completed.

Prince Philip's green forces decided that because the Tasmanian people wanted the hydro development, their drive to "green" Tasmania would not be achieved democratically.

To stop future dams, i.e. the Franklin Dam, they imported green activists from outside Tasmania, and then the High Court—which had been led for more than a decade by ACF founding president Sir Garfield Barwick—overturned the Constitution, to enable the Commonwealth to override Tasmania's right to develop.

Not satisfied with stopping future dams, the green fascists to this day are gunning to dismantle the existing infrastructure by draining Lake Pedder.

Pious hypocrite Bob Brown has long protested Tasmania's hydro scheme by keeping his Launceston cabin off the power grid; Brown's alternative choice of fuel for energy? Wood!

Forestry

The green lock down of Tasmania.

Forty-four per cent of the land area of Tasmania is now locked away in a comprehensive reserve system.

The Wilderness Society and The Greens (political party), both spawned out of the Franklin Dam fight, insist on locking up even more.

In the current Tasmanian Forest Agreement, they are targeting 430,000 hectares of public forests for lock down—a killer blow to the already-dying timber industry, historically one of Tasmania's five most important industries.

Bob Brown, Christine Milne, and the Tasmanian Greens use their federal clout to impose on the Tasmanian people against their wishes policies to shut down the timber industry and related industries; the Greens power is leveraged from the preference agreement they have with the Australian Labor Party, which was brokered in the 1980s by ALP "fixer" Graham Richardson, using laundered corporate donations.

The Tasmanian Land Conservancy is targeting freehold land for purchase, to lock away as private nature preserves.

Recently, the millionaire founder of the Kathmandu outdoor clothing store, Jan Cameron, has used her fortune to team up with Robert Purves, a director of Prince Philip's World Wide Fund for Nature (WWF), to spend $20 million buying and locking away more than 27,000 hectares of forests from sawmillers; Cameron received her millions from Malcolm Turnbull's Goldman Sachs JBWere, the leading bank in the world for financing green scams, such as carbon trading.

WWF-stooge Cameron was also recently able to purchase—at a discount—the Triabunna wood chip mill, and install feral tree-climbing Wilderness Society stalwart Alec Marr as chief executive officer, with the view to shutting it down, and ruining the local timber industry that supplies the facility.
